You will be able to enjoy the biodiversity, culture and scenic beauty, you will discover here with the support of local guides, numerous options of attractions and tourist activities to do such as ecotourism, hiking in the highest mountains of Costa Rica, archeology, native peoples, communities and rural, forest reserves, national parks, rivers, waterfalls, hot springs, exuberant biodiversity, butterfly gardens, botanical gardens, hundreds of birds, mountain biking sites, a large number of orchids, galleries, and many more. The area also offers art galleries, museums, sugar mills, ethnotourism, caverns, canopy, kayaking, integral farms, environmental organizations, coffee production, trout and tilapia fishing, a variety of lodging alternatives, a wide gastronomic offer, and day tours, among others.

Buenos Aires

Surrounded by the Talamanca Mountain Range, the canton of Buenos Aires has a large number of hills and forests with altitudes ranging from 500 to 3000 meters above sea level, where you can see a variety of species of flora and fauna, while breathing the cleanest and purest fresh air.

Buenos Aires is a place with a great water resource, drained by majestic rivers, waterfalls, streams and creeks. Clean and pure waters where you can bathe and enjoy nature.

The La Amistad International Park (PILA), which is classified as a Biosphere Reserve, covers 8.3% of the canton.

Buenos Aires is the canton cradle of indigenous cultures, and offers its visitors a wide variety of cultural, handicraft, gastronomic and historical experiences in its 7 indigenous territories, which represent 36.9% of the canton:

1. Ujarrás
2. Salitre
3. Cabagra
4. Térraba
5. Curré
6. Boruca
7. Guaymí

► Salitre, Bribri ethnic group. The Salitre indigenous territory is one of the four Bribri indigenous territories in Costa Rica. It is located in the canton of Buenos Aires, province of Puntarenas. The Bribri reserve is of great importance in terms of the activities it promotes. This native village offers services for visitors to learn about their culture: they have a green iguana farm, produce native handicrafts such as bows and wooden arrows, bags, nets, hammocks, baskets, etc.

► Cabagra, Bribri ethnicity. The Cabagra indigenous territory is located in the districts of Buenos Aires and Potrero Grande. The Bribri have preserved their language in their oral record, although a great effort is made to encourage their writing. The most important activity is agriculture, mainly cocoa and bananas, although they also grow corn, beans and tubers. They also raise pigs, hunt birds and fish. Their most important handicraft expression is basketry and the manufacture of musical instruments, for which they use various natural inputs.

► Boruca, Brunca ethnic group. The Boruca (also known as Brunca, Brunca or Brunkajc) are a native indigenous people of Costa Rica. Like their predecessors, the Boruca are known for their handicrafts, especially weavings, and their unique masks painted on balsa wood. These masks are important in the annual ceremony of the Boruca devils' game, which has been celebrated every end of the year since colonial times.

The festival represents the struggle between the diablitos (the Boruca people) and the Spanish conquistadors and is accompanied by food, such as pork, tamales and the traditional drink: "chicha".

► Curré, Brunca ethnic group. The Curré Indigenous Territory is a Costa Rican indigenous territory and one of the two territories of the Boruca or Brunca people, the other being the Boruca indigenous territory, both defined in 1993.

The main economic activities are cattle, pig, equine and poultry farming, handicrafts and salaried work in neighboring companies. The main products are corn, beans, rice, tubers, plantain and squash. The traditional drink, chicha, is also produced.

Like Boruca, Curré also has an indigenous community museum, and being also of the Brunca ethnic group, they share some customs and traditions, such as the "Baile de los Diablitos" (Dance of the Little Devils).

► Ujarrás, Cabécar ethnic group. Ujarrás is one of Costa Rica's indigenous territories of the Cabécar people, founded in 1982.

The Cabecares are one of the indigenous peoples who have managed to maintain a large part of their identity. They are one of the most culturally diverse peoples in Costa Rica, as they practice almost all of their traditional ways of life: they have their own natural medicine, dances, hunting, fishing, traditions, culture, religion and language. After the Bribri, they are the indigenous ethnic group with the largest number of individuals in the country.

In addition to the presence of an abundant forest and a clean and crystalline river that supplies drinking water to a large number of the population of Buenos Aires, this territory has the presence of hot springs.

► Térraba, Teribes ethnic group. The Terrabas are a group belonging to the Naso ethnic group originally from the province of Bocas del Toro, Panama. During colonial times, this ethnic group was known by various names, among them: texbi, terbi, térrebe, téjada, térraba.

As part of their rich cultural identity, they have traditions such as the tiger dance, the snake dance, the sorbón dance, the gallote, the bull and mule dance and the corbeco shrimp.

They also celebrate "the snake dance" (Ööka Bëyo), which is a song about a large snake that marries a teribe girl.

The Teribes also make baskets of different sizes, hand-woven majagua hammocks and articles made of laurel and cedar wood, such as trays, pylons, drum bodies and mainly canoes, in which they excel as excellent carvers.

Pérez Zeledón

The mountain product is identified with the canton of Pérez Zeledón, where the Chirripó National Park and Amistad International Park stand out as Ramsar Sites as well as a World Heritage Site recognized by UNESCO. In addition, there are several private reserves.

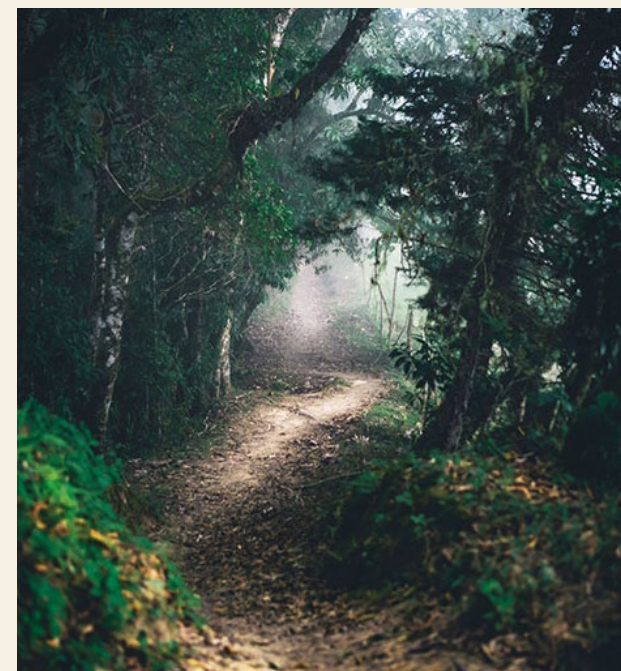

Rurality and especially community-based rural tourism is the newest product being developed in the highlands of Pérez Zeledón and Buenos Aires.

Perez Zeledon is therefore an ideal tourist area for those who seek adventure and practice ecotourism. It is a region of high contrasts where the tourist can visit all the way from beaches with profuse and very humid tropical vegetation, to the highest elevations of the country, where the low temperatures correspond to unique ecosystems and geological formations in Costa Rica. The rivers and waterfalls of this region are also of great scenic beauty.

The canton offers a wide range of adventure activities such as: canopy, hiking, rafting, horseback riding, mountain biking, paragliding, and others.

One of the best positioned types of tourism in the canton is nature tourism, as it is an excellent point of access for the growing ornithological tourism, which is well highlighted in the area, finding a great variety of birds, and highlighting the ornithological sanctuary par excellence, Los Cusingos, the home of the famous ornithologist Alexander Skutch, who gave birth to one of his great works, the famous book Birds of Costa Rica. In addition to ornithology, there is the majestic Chirripó National Park, and other natural reserves, it should be noted that part of the canton's territory is within the biosphere reserve designated by UNESCO.

Rural tourism - rural community, the Pezeteño canton is a region with agricultural roots, and over the years agriculture has become the predominant economic activity. In rural communities, the idiosyncrasy and customs of yesteryear, as well as traditions and culture in general, are still very much alive. There are about 16 recreational centers and agritourism farms that are committed to this type of tourism.

Wellness tourism is another strength of the area through different hotels in line with spiritual regeneration through activities and yoga retreats, there are about 8 Spas and among them we find the largest Spa in Central America in Hacienda Alta Gracia.

The pezeteño canton has several tourism options: flora and fauna observation, shopping for handicrafts and coffee, hiking trails, canopy, hot springs, bird watching with equipment, horseback riding, rural community tourism wellness, visiting clients, suppliers or business meetings, visits to museums (Topolandia), rivers (Savegre River), honeymooning.

China Kichá

It should be added that, in the territory of Pérez Zeledón, there is the Indigenous Territory of China Kichá, with an area of 1100 hectares, that belongs to the Cabécar culture.

These original people of the canton of Perez Zeledon are in the district of Pejibaye, where they carry on with their traditions and customs and still maintains important features of their culture, such as language, spiritual tradition and the system of affiliation, among others.

Recommendations

Baggage: No more than 10 kilos. You should carry food, water for hydration, snacks, clothes and everything you need to climb, do not forget the gaiters, an extension of the pants that joins the shoes.

Regardless of the time of year, it is best to place everything in plastic bags to prevent them from getting wet.

Limit yourself to carrying one sleepwear and one hiking garment that you will wear every day.

Very important: windbreaker coat, sweater, hat, gloves, scarf, microfiber cloth, two pairs of socks boots, sandals or beach shoes (they do not weigh and do not take up space), personal items including toothbrush, toothpaste, soap, cream ... all in small containers, and a camera, you will want to photograph every step.

Carry a shared medical kit. You will also need a walking stick and flashlight, hopefully a headlamp.

Food: dried seeds, protein bars and hot chocolate, coffee, bread or tortillas. Go with friends, so the burdens of meals is spread out.

Chirripó NP

The summit is 3,821 meters above sea level (12,537 feet) and is the best-known mountain in the Talamanca mountain range, and one of the highest in Central America. It offers visitors unparalleled landscapes, including lakes of glacial origin. From its summit, on clear days it is possible to see the Pacific Ocean and the Caribbean Sea looking southwest or northeast respectively; in addition, 3/4 of the country and Panamanian territories can be seen. At its highest point you can observe plains, steep peaks, glacial lakes, forests and a great variety of nature.

La Amistad International Park

If you want to take an excursion to La Amistad International Park in Costa Rica, you should know that it borders Panama and is actually a binational park, since the governments of both nations decided to share its management because it is located between borders. In 1983 it was declared a World Heritage Site by UNESCO.

The tours in La Amistad International Park usually consist of a guided and narrated tour in which the history of the place is explained, as well as other information of interest, such as the fact that it is the largest nature reserve in Central America, or that its biodiversity exceeds four hundred species of birds, more than one hundred species of mammals and exactly 91 species of amphibians.

This park is the largest wilderness area in Costa Rica. It covers almost 200,000 hectares of paramo, rainforests and cloud forests.

Bird watching

Costa Rica is a privileged place in Latin America for bird watching. In addition to belonging to the tropical biome, factors such as topography and varied relief, concentrated in a small country, allow the existence of a large number of forest types, favoring the diversity of avifauna. More than 50% of Costa Rica's bird families are found in the area, with more than 180 highland, midland and lowland species. In addition to the diversity of public and private protected areas, this makes the area a privileged zone for birdwatching.

Neotropical bird sanctuary Los Cusingos

It is another of our private reserves and originates from the estate where one of our pioneers lived: Alexander Skutch. Located in Quizarrá de Pérez Zeledón, it has a museum with objects of this prolific ornithologist, surrounded by a botanical garden.

Los Cusingos has an extension of 78 hectares in which there is a trail of almost 2 kilometers near San Isidro de El

General, former home of botanist and ornithologist Alexander Skutch. Here you can find Turquoise Cotinga and Baird Trogon. Other birds include the red-breasted wren, ruddy-breasted woodcreeper, river wren, two-colored antbird, purple-crowned fairy, red-headed skipper, blue-crowned skipper, orange-necked skipper, and the famous fiery-billed aracari.

Las Quebradas

It is near San Isidro de El General and Chirripó NP at an altitude between 1000 and 2500m. The project is especially proud of the diversity of birds and butterflies that live in its forest. They have already built a butterfly farm and are also looking to improve bird watching opportunities in the area. Experts suspect that there are about 200 different birds in the protected area.

The crests of Cerro Terbi are a national symbol of the country's natural wealth. These structures were declared a national symbol on April 6, 2011, under Bill #17437, as a symbol of Costa Rica's natural wealth. It is a mountain of plutonic or igneous volcanic glacial modeling (formed inside the earth's crust by slow cooling of the magma, allowing time for its components to crystallize), where structures called arêtes (ridges) converge.
